The principles of anaesthesia are the same for all patients, but some problems may be unique in pregnancy. The anaesthetist must be aware of the physiological changes of pregnancy, be able to modify the anaesthetic technique for the management of these changes and, at the same time, provide optimum conditions for the patient and the foetus. Experience has shown that the relatively benign complications of anaesthesia during pregnancy are greatly reduced if the anaesthesia is provided by a team with experience of anaesthesia in pregnant patients. Close monitoring is required for early detection of problems and prompt intervention is required to prevent untoward effects of anaesthesia.Differential effects of anthracycline and adriamycin on exocrine pancreatic function in rats. To determine whether anthracyclines and adriamycin are associated with pancreatic damage in rats, we assessed the exocrine pancreatic function of female Sprague-Dawley rats at 50-77 days of age, following treatment with either doxorubicin or adriamycin, at either 7 or 14 days intervals. At sacrifice, we evaluated pancreatic weight, wet pancreas and pancreas-to-body-weight ratios, protein, DNA, and amylase concentrations, and enzyme activities of protein, amylase and chymotrypsin. For the histologic evaluation of the pancreas, a conventional light-microscopic examination of sections stained with hematoxylin and eosin was used, and an index of exocrine pancreatic injury was determined. These parameters were compared with the controls. Both drugs caused a significant reduction in pancreatic weight and wet pancreas and pancreas-to-body-weight ratios (with the greatest effect at the 7-day time point), a significant increase in DNA content,
